

A Humorous Letter

Chelsea, Feb. 7, 1882.

My dear Judge — I received your little pamphlet on a big subject. It is capitally written, and the author has done herself and her topic equal justice. It makes me wish I were some Joan Keas Younger that I might go up there with you and skip over the verdant meads and enjoy the beauties of scene and the delights of circumstance, foremost of the latter, butter milk! then new cheese!! I was in California a few years ago on a milk ranche, where they skinned the juice of forty cows daily, and I was in clover for butter milk — preferred it as a beverage to the lactated plenty. Your happiness must be complete of this when the season comes, for I know you enjoy more to the square inch than an uncultured ^{man} can to a fact, with your bucolic fancies, and substantial verities of sows and oxen about you. No wonder you can sing when you return - but not there. No man can sing of sublime and beautiful nature when her attributes are all aspread before him. You may talk stick with your farmer or customer, but the singing must be left to the clout, what time men pour over their backs the midnight ile. It would please me to see you amid your ruralities, with your boots and overalls and the uncon-stant of the occasion - books forgotten, the law ignored, judgment deferred, non-ass requested, save such as flow from the proud position of master of the situation, the sovereign of the soil. I can well fancy that regard for you which craps out in neighborhood and brings its best tribute to welcome you withal, when you come to lecture them, or be one among them in a democracy that knows no party distinction. I should do so myself, and admire a man standing so much of a man among them, yet the equal of them all. But as I can't be there, all I can do is to wish you what you have already, full enjoyment of the "glorious privilege of being independent", of life under the homestead roof tree, of all that must make living delightful, and may it, like a serial story of charming import, "be continued."

Yours most truly,

T. B. Skillman

I wish I could come to see you, but like Sterne's starting "I can't get out," my foot, just subsiding from a heavy swell, has been large enough to stop a railway train or subject me to pay for extra baggage on the cars.
