

RA281-D--TROPHY TO DEFEAT.

This sagging pile of weathered boards is more booty for waste in the grim battle American farmers wage against drought, erosion and misuse of land. When the Resettlement Administration bought land for the construction of Greenbelt, families on this land were found living in houses some of which were even worse than this one. What chance for an American standard of living here? On the old estates in the vicinity of Borwyn, Maryland, tobacco had been grown since colonial times, seriously depleting the soil. Resettlement's program of proper land use is restoring the productivity of these lands in the greenbelt region surrounding the residential and business sections of the town of Greenbelt. In this broad girde of farms and parks from which the town takes its name, neighboring farmers will work the farms, insuring a plentiful supply of fresh food for the residents of the town.
