The Committee on Resolutions on the death of Prefessor A. M. Miller report which was accepted by the Senate:

Although Professor Arthur McQuiston Miller had been absent from the campus for a number of years before his death on October 28, 1929, there are many of the faculty mambers who were his associates in his days of active service, all of whom were his friends. All admired his sterling worth as a man and a scientist. Many generations of students felt the invigorating influence of his teaching and the strength of his personality.

Professor Miller came to the University in 1892, after thorough training in geology and bioldgy at Princeton and abroad. He did not spare himself in those days when the teaching load was heavy and one man often carried a variety of subjects. At the same time he continued his own study until he became the outstanding authority of the country on Kentucky geology. Later, in 1907, he assumed the duties of the deanship, with little relief from his former teaching duties. After ten years he resigned the deanship, and devoted his entire time to geology, until 1925, when ill health force his retirement as professor emeritus.

Professor Miller was remarkable for his breadth of interests. In the earlier days he was active in the promotion and guidance of athletics. He was one of a small group of professors in Kentucky who becan the work of establishing standards for the accrediting of secondary schools. He helped to found the Association of Kentucky Colleges and Kentucky Academy of Science. He was deeply interested in both the purely scientific and the commercial aspects of geology. He had received thorough training in the classics and believed strongly in their value for the training of cultured men and women. He believed it the duty of all to fight for freedom of teachingand he wrote vigorously in its defence. He was willing to sacrifice personal interests and comfort for the sake of his beliefs, his students and his University.
