Senate council OKs health plan

Proposal to offer health-care coverage to UK's graduate employees goes to full senate in 1999

After undergoing some changes, the proposal to provide health care coverage for graduate students was accepted by the University Senate Council for submission to the University Senate part December.

mission to the University Senate next December.

The revised version of the proposal provides 100 percent individual health care coverage to all full-time teaching assistants (TAs), research assistants (GAs), graduate assistants (GAs), target opportunity research assistants (TRAs) and fellows.

Their spouses and/or dependents would also have the option of joining the UK health plans at the substidized index rates.

A large problem that faces graduate students who work full-time for the University in these positions is that when they sign their contract with UK, they agree not to work anywhere else.

"To receive health coverage, you must be part of a group. When TAs, RAs and fellows sign their contract, they cannot belong to any other group (other than UK). Because of this, the University is obligated to provide this coverage." said Joe Schuler, the Student Government Associa-tion's senator for the College of Social Work and a member of the

When Susan Mains, SGA senator for UK's Graduate School and a senate council member, put together this proposal, part of her research was getting input from various graduate students.

Among their concerns were the high costs of paying out of pocket for medical expenses not covered by the undergraduate student plan (such as allergy medications), and having to pay for outside insurance for spouses

"A lot of graduate students feel that they're just here because they're cheap labor." Mains said.

"Giving them equal health coverage (as full-time faculty) sends such a strong message of support in that they're valued not just because of their teaching and research, but as contributors towards the broader character and dynamism of UK."

Mains found that various other schools, including a number of UK's benchmark schools, did offer health care benefits to their graduate students.

their graduate students.

Roy Moore, senate council chair, said the past argument against such a proposal has been that there wasn't the funding. But he said that equal health-care coverage should be a priority.

"What's so important about this is that it is a major step in helping recruit the type of gradu-ate students that would play a significant role in raising the University to the status of a top-20 public research university," Moore said.

Under the current system many graduate students are frus trated.

"Many of my students see no difference between their profes-sors and me," said Bill James, a TA and doctoral candidate in the Spanish department.

"Yet there is a difference. My students will not see their professors standing in line at the Health Department waiting to be seen by a doctor on a sliding fee scale."

Among the personnel who watch the library are two Andy Frain security guards, which monitor the building between midnight and 7 a.m.

Their duties include checking and directing visitors, making sure people do not leave with unchecked materials, handling building problems and disturbances within the library, said Paul Willis, director of libraries.

One guard works the security desk while the other patrols the building.

But Lauren Ledford doesn't understand the security policy.

"I don't know why they do that," said Ledford, a pre-physician assistant fresh-men who has been sent home to get her ID.

Also recently denied access to the library because he didn't have an ID was Matt Syvertsen.

"There were many problems at the King Library with people bothering the students," said Allison Thielmeier, the third-shift supervisor and a library science graduate student.

UK doctors release new device

New laser technique gives doctors ability to detect plaque in arteries

By Jason Feldmann

UK researchers have developed a new laser technique called near-infrared spectroscopy that detects one cause of heart attacks and will hopefully help predict them.

Heart attacks and strokes have been linked to plaques, or material composed of cholesterol and other fatty substances, which contribute to atherosclerosis, a process that chokes the heart's arteries, narrows the blood vessel and reduces blood flow.

"With further refinement, this new narrows the blood vessel and reduces blood flow.

"With further refinement, this new spectroscopy technology could be incorporated into a catheter and produce a better picture of what's going on inside the coronary arteries of living patients, allowing us to treat these plaques and diminish the devastating effects of heart disease," Pedro R. Moreno, Assistant Professor of Medicine, said in a news release.

The ability to detect such plaques is the good news.

The bad news is that current medical technology has no clear way to prevent the imminent attack.

The bad news is that current medical technology has no clear way to prevent the imminent attack.

Most people have plaques in their blood vessels, but more research by UK scientists will hopefully lead to new findings, and eventually a way to determine which plaques are harmful and which are benign.

A tiny catheter, placed in the arteries, would contain a near-infrared probe and be used to take "pictures" of plaques.

Near-infrared light emitted through the probe would create the pictures, and their computer analysis would indicate which plaques are likely to cause a heart attack.

which plaques are likely to cause a heart attack.

The near-infrared spectroscopy system identifies the composition of different substances according to their light absorption. It has been used in commercial use to grade the amount of fat in food.

This method has only been tested in animals and cadavers but could be ready for study in humans within two years, said UK officials.

In Billy Madison he played a dim-witted loser, in his newest movie, funny man Adam Sandler plays... a dim-witted loser, in his newest movie, funny man Adam Sandler plays... a dim-witted loser... So much for variety. Sandler stars as Bobby Boucher, a sheltered, mann's boy moron from the back woods of Cajiun country In Louisiana. Despite eding big football fan Sandler's life centers around his job as waterboy for a college football team. After being fired after more than a decade of service. Sandler sets out to find a new position. He happens upon small South Central Louisiana University. The team hasn't won a game in four years, the cheerleaders and mascot spend the game doing shots and usually pass out before from a nervous breakdown.

Predictably, it turns out Sandler has a natural talent as a ferocious tackler. Visualizing his enemies and drawing from the pain of many years of torment, Sandler levels massive hits on the opposition and soon leads his team into bowl contention. The rest of the story follows the standard blueprint. Right before the big game with the team that fired him. Sandler is accused of cheating to get into college. He's cleared, the team wins, he's the hero. Everyone stappy.

Despite the pathetic script and disposable characters, sandler delivers enough laughs to keep the movie from being a complete disaster. His bone-crunching hits on the opposition provide laughs and the characters moronic charm allows for a few glimpses of how funny the movie could have been with a better story.

Former stand-up comic Blake Clark also delivers laughs as the inarticulate, hard-drinking, nipple-ringed assistant coach. Sandler's former SNL castmate Rob Schneider also shows up halfway through in an amusing cameo as another back-woods idiot.

Pretty boys 'N Sync spoil the spirit of Christmas with its new album of classic melodies

ABSTHAT DIAGOUE EDITOR

There's nothing worse than being sick at Christmas, right?

The great food, the lights that chase each other, the family members — all these things are beautiful aspects of the coolean coolean of the coolean

And I mean sick, as in fetalposition-in-the-bed-throwing-upin-a-trash-can-while-you-watch"A-Charlie-Brown-Christmas"for-the-thousandth-time sick.
Here's how it'll happen:
You'll be attracted to a record store, whereupon you'll see a slick new CD on the shelves. On the cover, Justin, Chris, JC, Joey and Lance are pimped out in their pretty-boy clothes, smiling at you through some holly.

If you don't puke at the sight of 'N Sync, you'll buy the CD and take it to the nearest available CD player.

If the CD player doesn't refuse to play such crap, you'll start listening through the weak renditions of such Christmas Favorites as "The Christmas Song Chestnuts Roasting on an Open Fire)," "Home for Christmas," "The First Noel," and "O Holy Night."

That's when it will set in, the feared Christmas sickness. At first, it'll start as a bad headache, growing more and more painful as you, hear the tracks on 'N Sync's album.

Even if you listen to the CD right now, still more than a month away from the holiday, you don't have a chance at recovering before the holly-decked celebrations.

Like any other festive little music critic, I love Christmas music more than anything (except Bach and Metallica), but 'N Sync has wreaked yuletide havoc on some classic tinsel-time melodies.

The 'N Sync method of Christmas caroling is this: Turn on the drum machine and squeal like a prepubescent boy, and start singing.

But apparently the traditional melodies aren't a major concern for the group of guyen who are every 12-year-old girl's dream — because their version of 'The Christmas Song' doesn't sound like any chestnuts I've ever roasted on an open five like in the promise you would like any chestnuts I've ever rosted on an open five sick when you go home for Christmas this year, but I can tell you a certain way to avoid it: Don't by the 'N Sync Christmas album.

Kevin Coleman is the middle man.

He catches the pigskin in places most receivers avoid.
Places that automatically entail getting pulverized by men coming at you with 44-speed from various directions, all with the intention of decapitating a defenseless receiver. The senior from Niceville, Fla., has caught 65 passes for 840 yards and 10 touchdowns for the Cats coming into this season. In UK's first Air Raid, Coleman burst out on the seene with 52 receptions for 621 yards and eight touchdowns to complement speed burner Craig Yeast.

But 1986 started off slow.

ly for Coleman. He seemed a forgotten man while UK spread the wealth amongst its stable of receivers. In his first four games, Coleman had only eight catches and one touchdown, leading some to wonder where he had disappeared to Yeast had an explanation.
"Kevin is one of those guys that starts slow," Yeast said. "Then he finishes strong. You forget he's out there, then he comes on like a mad man and racks up yards and touchdowns. He's just always been a slow starter." Coleman's slow start took off after UK's loss at Florida, as he once again found life in the middle of the field a profitable one. He has posted three 100 yard receiving games since then, including the last two straight and has caught 27 passes in those five games. The streak was punctuated with an eight catch. 105-yard, one-touchdown performance against Mississippl State on Saturday.

Braden said she hasn't had a losing streak like this in a while. She did recall her first year of coaching at Butler. Her team started off 0-17 and then three years later was 24-10 and won the conference championship.

Braden doesn't have three years to wait, because she and the team have two more games before the Southeastern Conference Tournament begins. "We're just going to try to compete and get out of this rhythm," Braden said. "The SEC tournament is like another season.

The correct answer is that each of us is old when we think we are when we accept an attitude of dormancy, dependence on others, a substantial limitation on our physical and mendal activity, and restrictions on the number of other people with whom we on the number of other people with whom we interact. As I know from experience, this is not tied very closely to how many years we've lived."

If the state legislature is not passing the laws Ventura wants, he can strut over there from the governor's mansion and put the majority leadership in a headlock.

That'll make state officials think twice about not working on his agenda.

When he goes to schools and civic functions to speak about what's happening in Minnesota, Ventura can inject some excitement into the boredom an audience experiences during normal political orations. He can set up

That'll make the interest groups back down from their feverish lobbying.

Finally, Ventura will be one of the first political leaders in the nation who will have the ability to control the media. The media will work to bolster his stance on important issues.

Barton fires a blank with strip-club advice

Matt Barton's column on "strip-club etiquette" was way out of line.

Throughout the entire column, Barton consistently portrayed women as self-centered, pet ty, en vious childred the tertainment, I am offended by Barton's implication that women only "demand" to accompany their boyfriends to strip clubs to keep tabs on them.

His rules of conduct are an inadequate and incomplete representation of women's attitudes toward adult entertainment, and only succeed in reflecting the author's own deep insecurities.

Admittedly, there probably are women who accompany their boyfriends to these clubs to keep an eye on them, and these women might also become envious of their fella's attentions or feel threatened by the atmosphere in general.

But an equal number of women are secure enough in their sexuality and their relationships not only to revel in, but initiate, such an outing.

Barton disregards any possibility that a girlfriend might actually find pleasure in attending a strip club.

Twice he mentions "encouraging" your girlfriend to tip the dancer's attention and cause the girlfriend to feel less threatened. Secondly, "it helps the lousy dancers to spice up their act with artificial lesbian allure."

Both motives Barton mentions for having your girlfriend tip the dancer are purely selfish. Never does he consider that women might want to tip.

In these two suggestions, he treats both categories of women (girlfriends and strippers) as mere objects. The girlfriend is just a tool for getting the stripper's attention and manipulating the stripper site of the stripper of course, is only good for entertaining men, not women. It never seems to occur to Barton that lesbian sexuality is legitimate in its own right, and isn't simply to provide him with another turnon.

to remain next to their girlfriends "at all times." Supposedly, this is to discourage "all the local Romeos." If find it curious that it's OK for the boyfriend to flirt with the dancers, but not for the girlfriend to flirt with the other men in the club.

Perhaps if Barton is so concerned about losing his girlfriend to some sleaze in a strip club, he should improve himself before turning to possessiveness for the answer.

Not only does this possessiveness illustrate Barton's insecurities but also it is a blatant display of his perception of women as mere objects. In the article, Barton makes two claims that are actually correct.

Duh! I think most boyfriends would probably be equally angry at their girlfriends receiving a couch dance from a male stripper.

(Although. "playing your cards right (and) getting one at home for free" is yet another example of women as sex objects.)

Two: "An ounce of sensitivity goes a long way," but it doesn't sound like Barton had even an infinitesimal amount of sensitivity while writing this article.

Good luck next time.

New library is great - if you can find a place to park

To the editor:

I am writing on behalf of cereyr student who lives off campus and wants to use our new beautiful library.

I fully understand that he "choice" parking lots near the University should be reserved for those other than students, but our inability to park in these lots after hours is ridiculous.

The world is not a safe place, and we read many articles on how dangerous it is for students to walk by themselves at night.

The confusion is, how are those of us who do not live on South Campus supposed to use our new library when the only lot open holds a minimal amount of care.

At least, the University should raise the gates to the lots on Columbia Avenue after a certain hour so students can park and use the library hourly night of the pride and loy.

It is scary and frustrating the control of the library hourly now in the library hourly in our million-dollar pride and Joy.

The University spent millions of dollars on a library for the students, so why can't it consider the students when it comes to matters such as these?

Scores don't create sports

Create sports

To the editor:

Frequently, universities are centers of learning and forward thinking. So I like to pick up a copy of the Kernel occasionally and see what's going on, get a taste of the wider world that the Herald-Leader fails to provide. I guess what I've heard them about assuming things is true.

Shock is a mild description of what I felt upon reading a letter to the editor with the theme of "soccer is not a real sport." Did I miss something? What happened to the comparison of the sport of the comparison of the comparison of the stage of the comparison of the comparison of the temptation to wander off on his tangent about the United States being "the greatest nation in the history of the world."

What about hockey?

States being "the greatest nation in the history of the world."
What about hockey?
Those games can be low- or no-score contests, and yet we have both an AHL team and a college club team in town that are enjoying reasonable popularity, considering they aren't UK basketball, which I also like, don't get me wrong. Is hockey not a real sport because of its potential for a 0-0 tie?
Furthermore, a recent cause of its potential for a 0-0 tie?

Furthermore, A recent New York Times article explored the emerging trend for both U.S. citizens and immigrants from various nations to gather in American bars/pubs/restaurants to watch their favorite foreign soccer teams play via pay-perview and private satellite transmission. ESPN, that bastion of American culture, even offers a two-hour program dedicated to English soccer, plus a weekly pay-per-view game.

plus a weekly pay-per-view game.
Is it possible that all that World Cup media coverage was just a group hallucination, or are more people actually interested in this stuff?
I think they are.
It's disappointing to think some people believe anything that is not an American invention is worthless.
The display of an athlete's skill and the spirit of competition are most important, not how often you "score" — un-less you're in high school!

Hate crimes are terrorism against society

against society
To the editor:
I would like to respond to Marissa Fugate's comments
'Opinions on murder missed the problem."
No one is suggesting that Matthew Shepard's life was more valuable or his death more tragic than anyone else's.
If we must look for comparisons, consider the black man dragged to his death behind a pickup truck last summer. These incidents receive national attention because the victims were singled out for being members of a group that the perpetrators wished to intimidate or eliminate.

In plainer words, these are lynchings, acts of terrorism.

They strike at core Ameri-

In plainer words, these are lynchings, acts of terrorism.

They strike at core American values in a way that murder motivated by greed, revenge, passion or random aggression does not.

The outrage comes not from the fact that the victim was "X," but that he was targeted for his "X"-ness. Yes, this moves the crime into a different category.

The law has always distinguished between motives in determining just punishment for capital offenses.

These acts are not really directed at the victims, who are, after all, anonymous symbols to their torturers, but rather at a whole class of citizen. These are crimes against society, like a bomb in the marketplace. We should indeed take extra measures to send a clear message to those who would use fear to force their standards on the rest of us.

Lowe's negative stereotypes were wrong

To the editor:

After I read this response about how Eric Lowe "doesn't care how popular something is... in any place where English is not the primary language," I laughed first because of the magnitude of his statements. Then as I read the next few paragraphs, I knew he was serious.

I wholeheartedly agree that one should say what he or she truly believes, as opposed to suppressing his or her opinion, but I trust the person will usually use tact and not use stereotypes.

I was born and reared in Lexington. I've been to 43 out of the 50 states and 11 foreign countries. I spent half a year studying in London.

What I learned was invaluable. There are more people in the world than just those from the United States. They have customs and ways of life that are just as exciting as ours.

Go to one of the Interna-

of life that are just as excum-as ours.
Go to one of the Interna-tional Festivals on campus and you'll begin to see this; di-crestity is a positive and excit-ing thing.
There's only one hin-drance that would keep a per-son from understanding these concepts of cultural rela-tivism and cultural diversity: close-minded bigotry.

DEATHS

'Always there to help out'

Students, friends, family remember marketing sophomore killed last weekend in accident

He had a big smile, a big laugh.

And for the rest of those students and teachers who knew 20-year-old Chad Alan Clore, his death will leave a big hole in their lives.

"Very easy to get along with," "outspoken," and "boldly honest" were phrases his friends used to characterize Clore, a marketing sophomore who died of his injuries after being hit by a train last Friday morning behind 1301 W. Main St.

Lexington Police, who responded to the accident, still do not know why Clore was walking along the tracks that night. His death shocked one of Clore's best friends Nathan Saly-ers, an accounting junior at UK.

"It didn't really sink in until (yesterday)," said Salyers, who was a pallbearer at the funeral yesterday at Burlington Baptist Church.

Both the funeral and visitation were filled with acquaintances, friends and family members who came to pay their respects.

"There was just tons of people, they couldn't fit anyone in the church," he said. "The line was constantly out the door for the visitation."

Knowing Clore's personali-

the visitation."
Knowing Clore's personality, no wonder.
"He made friends everywhere he went," Salyers said.
"If any of his friends were in trouble, he was always there to help them out; he just always had everyone's back."

From the time Salyers and Clore were in grade school in Union, Ky, the two were practically inseparable, he said.

In high school, "we were to gether everyday; he went on vacations with my family," said Salyers, who lived in the Triple Crown neighborhood in Union where Clore's family lived.

At Ryle High School, Clore, the baskeball fan who spent most of his early years in the gym made an unforgettable impression on his teachers.

Especially to Martha Duggins, a family and consumer sciences teacher at Ryle, was born. Clore since with Clore's father ken. "He had an enthusiasm that was contagious."

She knew him so well, at times, it felt like there was some psychic connection between them.

sometimes before I did," Duggins said.

Conversations were filled with basketball, which Clore played from his fifth-grade year through his junior year of high school, and friendly coercions to leave class early for lunch.

Then again, how could he miss out on his favorite dish: three-way chill.

"One day, he and his friends invited me to eat lunch with them at their table in the cafeteria," Duggins said.

On the court as a forward for the basketball team, Clore was "a competitive player, he gave his all all the time," said his father, who coached him at Ryle.

But the competitive attitude stopped with the Hoosters fan once he got home.
"He never left home without kissing his mother good-bye," Ken Clore said.
