Demolition continues for CentrePointe block

Exington resident Kevin Daringer, center, watches as the Rite Aid Pharmacy building is demolished yesterday evening. Daringer talked with Patrick Kelly, left Michaels about the block's demolition to make way for the CentrePointe project.

Demolition of the remaining buildings on the downtown block where CentrePointe is planned to be built began, last night.

Bulldozers worked to tear down the Rite Aid Pharmacy building while crowds of people gathered to watch and cars drove by honking, fists waring out the window.

"I can't believe the people, such a contrast," said Gary Michaels, Lexington resident. "For some people it's a spectacle, for others it's a loss."

The demolition went into the night until the entire pharmacy was leveled.

night until the entire pharmacy was leveled.

Circuit Judge Pamela Goodwine ruled Tuesday that no provisions of the law allow for a halt of demolition to the block and gave the go-ahead to raze the remaining buildings.

She ruled against an injunction filed by Preserve Lexington to stop demolition until a September meeting with the Planning Commission, with whom they filed an appeal.

Preserve Lexington, a historic preservation group, filed the appeal against the unanimous decision made in late June by the Courthouse Area Design Review Board to grant permits for the demolition of the block.

A city ordinance, which estab-lished the Courthouse Area Design Zone, allows for an appeal to the Planning Commission but does not However she is "totally disappointed" that the developers were not in court to answer questions about their development.

According to Court records, Goodwine said she hoped to ask the developers about the concept of their design "and why there was no community involvement."

As buildings fall, accept potential with new design

The bulldozers arrived, the buildings fell and with them went the last hopes for an appeal to stop the demolition of the CentrePointe block.

We knew it was coming — the razing was unanimously approved at the end of June. The Dame and Busters officially closed nearly a month ago—but still we held tight to the thought that someone (hopefully historical preservation group Preserve Lexington), somewhere would win an appeal and prevent the 35-story monstrosity from climbing into the downtown skies. But with the block being leveled we shouldn't pusse too long for ways to make the best out of the new hotel, returned to look ahead for ways to make the best out of the new hotel, returned to the production of the remaining buildings on the block, the economic impact for the Lexington community would be "incredibly significant."

ton community would be "incredibly significant."

"The economic benefits for years to come are absolutely and indisputably tremendous," Goodwine said. So if this is true and the city will benefit economically, even if not culturally, maybe there is something to look forward to.. but please led it be in a different package.

The Kernel commends the efforts of the College of Design in hosting a design workshop to generate alternate concepts for a hotel, however the designs were farfetched and hardly realistic. While we complain that the current design by Dudley and Woodford Webb is out-dated, unattractive and unfitting with the rest of the buildings in Lexington, the newly-generated alternatives fit in, if possible, even less.

Paul Preissner, faculty member at the University of Illinois at Chicago, and his team designed a set of high rises that bend and curve into the sky, somewhat resembling french fries, and stand in awkward comparison to the rest of downtown's architecture. The team led by Heather Flood and Ramiro Diaz Granados, faculty members at the Southern California Institute of Architecture didn't come close to achieving practicality either. Even Liz Swanson and Mike McKay, faculty in UK's College of Design, and their design team failed to come up with designs for the block that mirror the culture and history of Lexington.

Beshear wrong to think coal can be mined "environmentally"

Late last week, Gov. Steve Beshear had an announcement to make: he wants Kentucky to become the "energy cap ital of the world." In theo-world." In theo-ry, I guess that doesn't sound like too bad of a deal. A chal-lenge? Yes. But a problem? No. That is, until Beshear said how he was go-ing to do it. Beshear's proposed energy won't be an actual Guest ing to do it.

Columnist Beshear's proposed energy plan (note that there won't be an actual plan until September) will seek to integrate the development of renewable energy with the death knell of both a clean environment and a thriving Kentucky economy: coal. Beshear wants coal.
I cannot state it any plainer: Steve Beshear wants lots and lots of coal.
During his press conference, the governor said mountaintop removal, the easiest, cheapest and most destructive way of mining coal, could be done "environmentally." Despite the fact I'm not sure the governor just completed as sentence, he is completely wrong. There is nothing "environmentall," environmentally friendly, green, sustainable or ecologically sound about mountaintop removal, nor will there ever be.

To date, nearly 500 mountains in eastern Kentucky and West Virginia have been leveled, burying thousands of miles of streams that provide drinking water and contaminating even more with toxic waste from coal salary. The damage done by mountaintop removal is largely irreparable, but even the regulations requiring coal companies to 'reclaim' the land to its 'approximate original contour' are of ten ignored and poorly entorcoast. The provide of the intervention of ruling class of elite politicians from both parties refuse to accept the realisties that their constituents have already acknowledged, often moving our state backwards in a number of ways. Global warming is real and the coal industry is exploitative, both of eastern Kentucky's labor and land. There is more economic opportunity in progressing toward a climate neutral and renewable energy economy than there is in the coal industry. Providing our children with healthcare and a good education is more important than corporate welfare handed out to Peabody Coal. But the elder generations just don't seem to get these facts. Until they do, the Commonwealth is in a great deal of trouble.

So long as Kentucky's good ole boy Republicians and Democrats aren't held accountable for their miserable excuses for public policy, our state will continue to trail the rest of the nation in all meaningful midicators of economic development, education, public health, environmental protection and standard of living. In spite of our many differences, I think it should be easy for all Kentuckians of the current generation to agree on one thing: Neither of the political parties are addressing our needs, and we refuse to allow our state to continue to lag behind the rest of the nation. I chose to stay in Kentucky for a reason, but more and more, our state's politicians are giving me a reason to get out.

Court to FCC: Get real

Chicago Tribune on Tuesday, July 22:

Whatever Janet Jackson does in the remaining time she has in this world, she probably can't alter the first sentence of the obituaries that will run when she departs it. Unless she because a serial killer or a Nobel Peace Prize winner, she will forever be remembered for her hare right breast. It inspired the now-universal term "wardrobe malfunction," a creative way of describing the incident at the 2004 Super Bowl halfmen show hen fellow pop singer Justin Timberlake yanked at her costume, providing a brief, partial glimpse of her upper torso. We do mean brief — the flash of skin was over in exactly nine-six-teenths of a second. But for exposing football fans to that momentary image. He Federal Communications Commission came down hard on CBs, which broadcast the event. If found the network guilty of airing "indecent" material and levele a fine of $$550,000.

As a federal appeals court recognized Monday in throwing out the ial and levied a fine of $550,000.

As a federal appeals court recog-nized Monday in throwing out the fine, the decision was a gross overre-action to an obnoxious but unscripted display. The fine punished the wrong party, since CBS had no knowledge of Timberlake's intention and, in fact, had sent representatives to rehearsals to make sure nothing was out of line. In imposing the fine, the FCC retroactively applied a Draconian new policy on words and images that are indecent but fleeting, which the agency had previously tokenuc was "nitural previously tokenuc was "nitural previously tokenuc was "nitural previously to "change a well-essablished course of action without supplying notice of and a reasoned explanation for its policy departure."

The FCC penalty also greatly exagerated the harm done by the incident. No one was scarred. For anyone who merely saw the show live on TV, the flash was over before it had even registered in the brain.

The court spent much of its opinion refuting the FCC claim that Jackson and Timberlake were the functional equivalent of network employees, which it said made CBS liable for their conduct. It concluded that, in reality, they were independent contractors. If the government is going to punish the network for their conduct. It concluded that, in reality, they were independent contractors. If the government is going to punish the network for their expressive conduct, the court found, it has to prove CBS knew with they were planning or ecklessly ignored the profest judgment the profest planning or ecklessly ignored the profest judgment the profest planning or the profest planning the profess of the profe planning or recitessiy ignored me possibility.

Federal action was not needed to protect viewers, because CBS, embar-rassed by the episode, promptly took steps to prevent a repetition.
By the 2005 Super Bowl, a video delay was in place to catch anything inappropriate, and the halftime per-former was 62-year-old Paul McCart-ney, who is famous for keeping his clothes on. And even he had to submit his song lyrics for rigorous inspection.

A TRANQUIL GARDEN

DEMOLITION

Pointe block but it was "way too late."

"This is how things should have gone from the beginning: having a competition for the best design for the area but it didn't happen that way." Wilkirson said. Preserve Lexington will consider challenging the nature of how the project is designed, Wilkirson said, but the group first has to consider whether the challenge would be "a productive thing to do."
"Realistically, it's the only thing (Preserve Lexington) has left to do," Wilkirson said, "but the odds of influencing the project at this stage are awfully small and we haven't decided what we'll do."

by their summertime availability and their experience with similar types of projects.

"This had a tremendous impact (on the students)." Speaks said. "They were working in ways architects really work, and they had deadlines. They got real-world experience with issues connecting UK to the city they live in."

Speaks said he was unsure of how the building would inevitably impact the community.

"It's hard to know what (Centre-Pointe) is going to mean," he said. "It's a very important location in the city. Whatever is built there will have a big impact on the city for a long time."
