votes kegs back in houses, drawing fire

By VICTORIA MARTIN

With 12 fraternities powerless to vote, UK's Interfraternity Council decided yesterday to allow kegs back into fraternity houses.

In a meeting that lasted about an hour and a half, the IFC voted 6-4 to amend its year-old alcohol policy, which had prohibited fraternities from purchasing alcohol with chapter funds or distributing it at social functions.

Campus nightlife is action-packed for police officer

By TONJA WILT Executive Editor

Editor's note: The events in this story took place on the night of Sept. 15. The information was gathered while a reporter observed some of the events occurring during a typical night in the life of a UK police officer.

Work is the furthest thing from the minds of most UK students at 10 p.m. on a Saturday, but that is when UK Police Officer Jeff Schroering's shift begins. Schroering patrols UK until 7 a.m. — a time when there is "a different type of person" on campus, "You are actually catching the bad guys, the people who crawl through the windows," Schroering says.

A night in the life of a UK officer begins with installing and checking car equipment. Occasionally something will be missing, like the blue and red strobe lights on top of the cruiser.

"Somebody stole them off the top of the police car while it was sitting in the parking lot," Schroering says. "They took a big chance and they got away with it."

The night is busy, As Schroering waits at an intersection in front of the police department at South Limestone and Rose streets he sees a woman run a red light. Flipping on the sirens and lights, Schroering shams the accelerator to the floor and pulls over the red 1986 Mazda. He calls in his location on the radio and steps out of the patrol car, approaching the vehicle cautiously. The red and blue lights

After checking the license plate and driver's license numbers, he gives the

"A lot of them want to argue with you and that's what you don't want to do," Schroering says. "You (the officer) don't want to sit there and argue in the streets about it. That's what courts are for."

There are two types of people who receive citations, he says — those who know they have broken the law and admit their guilt, and those who break the law and deny it.
"Usually I try to be as nice as I can be with them, as nice as they'll let me," he says, although his courtesy is not always returned.

Schroering, who graduated from UK in 1988, proceeds to patrol South Campus, one of six districts patrolled at night by the campus police.

There are four driving districts and two foot patrol districts. As the vehicle, unit 22-162, cruises down Huguelet Drive, Schroering sees a man waving his arms and whistling.

UK investigation team closes cases

The head of the UK Police's Criminal investigations department has a no-nonsense philosophy about the cases he works on.

works on.
"My job is to get it closed — get them arrested, get them prosecuted, get them convicted," said Lt. Robert Abrams.
This hard-nosed attitude toward crime reflects the personality of Abrams himself. He is the stereotypical graff, burly gunshoe cop — almost out of place in a department that many students don't even know exist.
"First off, it's known as criminal investigations," he said, emphasizing the word criminal.

handles felony and other major case inves-tigations such as rape, robbery and assaults.

"We try to maintain a low profile ... and that's why I really don't like to talk to the press at all," Abrams said.
Abrams said he is reluctant to be interviewed because he doesn't want to influence the thinking of the person he questions in an investigation.
"I don't want people to know a lot about me," he said, so that "when I sit down and talk to you, you don't see this big, bad investigator."

But if Abrams comes across as a "big, bad investigator," the other half of this two-person force is his polar opposite.

Sgt. Bobbye Carpenter says that while getting a conviction in a case is important, her focus is to help people.

"He's right, that (conviction) is our ultimate end ... but I also take into my concept that I do what will help the victim feel beter," Carpenter said.

"Everybody isn't 6-foot-5 and huge and you can't go around that way — and don't seet me wrone; it works very well to be 6.

"Everybody isn't 6-foot-5 and huge and you can't go around that way— and don't get me wrong, it works very well to be 6-foot-5 and huge— but some of us don't have that ..., you have to use whatever you have, "she said.

Even without the asset of physical size, Carpenter said she still pushes for answers in her investigations.

"That's not to say I can't ever get gruff— I don't like people to lie to me when I

Some protest coffee, company

"The best part of waking up: No death squad coffee in your cup."
This slogan graced one of several protest signs as students and allumni gathered outside Patterson Office Tower yesterday to protest Folgers coffee, a Procter and Gamble product.

coffee, a Procter and Gamble held a meeting on the 18th floor to introduce students to the company. The boycott against Folgers coffee focused on the El Salvadoran upper class that produces the coffee beans. The protesters said these wealthy families monopolize land, leaving none for subsistence farming among peasants.

Americans contribute $300 million to help maintain the status quo in El Salvador by purchasing Folgers coffee, protesters said.

The Lexington Salvadoran Coffee Boycott Committee, which dubbed Folgers "Death Squad Coffee," formed last month and have been distributing literature on campus about Folgers.

The group circulated a petition which they hope to take to Procter and Gamble when they get enough signatures. They have gathered 800 names to date.

The protesters' flyer says the group opposes U.S. involvement in the civil-war plagued country. And they say that purchasing Salvadoran coffee contributes to that involvement.

It said the focus is on Folgers because it is the leading-selling coffee brand in the United States and that the focus in on it is unfair.

The LSCBC doesn't deny this.
In a flyer provided at the picket, they said "The boycott tactically focuses on Folgers at this time as it has the largest market share and uses the most Salvadoran beans."

The Kentucky Central America Information Network (KCAIN)

joined the coffee boycott, according to a pamphlet passed out at the protest, to "send a message to coffee companies in the U.S., and to our government, that Kentuckians don't approve of U.S. support of the Salvadoran government which allows these killing to continue." In one word, that's how UK mens' basketball coach Rick Plino described his recent pursuit of the country's finest basketball talent.

Taking a rare break from his nationwide recruiting visits, Plino held a press luncheon yesterday at Wildeat Lodge.

Award shows don't reflect public opinion

The following is the text of Arts Editor Michael Jones' last meeting with his psychiatrist, Dr. Norman Bates, on Sept. 24, 1990. Mr. Jones has been missing since that date. Dr. Bates: So what exactly do you think your problem is?
Jones: I'm developing a complex. It seems that no matter who I expect to win an award they never win.
It started out with just the Academy Awards. I was nine and I was convinced that "Star Wars" was the "Movie of the Year." I don't remember who did get the award that year, but it wasn't "Star Wars."
It went on like that for a while. Inever could pick any of the Academy Award winners, but I didn't get paranoid. I thought it was just a jinx that happened whenever I watched the presentation of that particular award.

Maybe I was allergie to the gold plating on Oscar's bald head. Or maybe it was just a reaction to anward named after a hot dog company.

Dr. Bates: Funny, my mother had the same problem.

Universities are where ideas get their start

Nowadays, it's pretty easy to become disenchanted with the political process

Each day in Washington, D.C., a new twist develops con cerning the Savings & Loan debacle, which has scrutinized the moral and ethical standards of the nation's leaders.

In Kentucky, as the 1991 gubernatorial election nears, prospective candidates court special interest groups and big money, promising to lend them an ear if elected.

Closer to home, the University community experienced a presidential search in which the institutions leaders were perceived as placing their own interests above the institution's

It's enough to give a person reason to recoil from society and seek one's self-interest.

Despite all the reasons to give up, some people around cam pus still have hope that things can be changed for the better of society.

Last week, the Student Activities Board's Contemporary Affairs Committee began weekly Brown-Bag Forums about contemporary issues. The forums, held at noon every Monday in the Old Student Center Theater places a special emphasis on grass-roots activism.

the visit of Robert Bellah next month. Bellah is a University of California-Berkely sociologist and author of Habits of the Heart, the widely acclaimed book that examined community and individualism in America.

In an age of soundbites and media consultants, the notion that a grass-roots movement can affect change may seem a bit anti-quated. The idea may have had merit during the days of Jefferson and de Tocqueville, cynics might say, but when the image is more important than the message, it is better to accept reality than to dwell in the past.

But to deny the power of individuals to affect change in society is to reject the fundamental principles the nation was built upon and supposedly still firmly rests.

Whether it is the Moral Majority boycotting a store for selling what it perceives to be offensive material or Greenpeace protesting the way a company disposes of its waste, many groups are proof that grass-roots efforts can make a difference Closer to home, activism concerning the Lexington Army Depot and Cumberland Lake provide examples of citizens trying to make a difference in their community

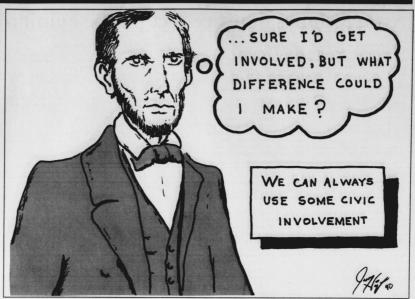

Whether one agrees with their position is irrelevant; what is important is that they add to the public debate and present an Iternative view to dominant attitudes.

A university is an excellent place for the discussion of issues and for new ideas to be developed. But those ideas will never have a chance of flourishing unless people make an effort to encourage them

Getting Along

Learning to get along with your roommate requires compromise

Dear Counselor: This year I'm rooming with my best friend from high school. I thought it was a great idea, since we already knew each other and there wouldn't be any nave ty surprises. Was I ever wrong!
I'm quiet, she's noisy; I'm neat, she throws her clothes all over the room; and every time I start to study, she comes in with her friends and they laugh and play cards all night.

and they laugh and play cards all might.

We're still terrific friends, but something's got to change or I'll never get my homework done or get any sleep. How can I talk to her without hurring her feelings or making her mad — I've tried a couple of time but nothing ever changes. Liz, business freshman.

Dear Liz: Isn't communication interesting? Two people can be friends for years — talking and getting their messages across. Then a negatively charged situation arises and nothing seems to work.

Sometimes fear stops us from saying what we'd like — as you said, being afraid we'll anger the other person or hurt their feelings.

Also, the thought that "she already knows this — she won't listen — nothing will change anyway."

These concerns are very real. So is the possibility that your roommate really doesn't know the seriousness of your concerns.

Here's a way to effectively communicate your problems and concerns to her — making them a part of the message and likely having some positive effect on the situation.

tion.

-Speak For Yourself. Use "I, me, my or mine messages." There should be no question that you're describing any experience other than your own. Instead of saying, "You were noisy again last night," try, "I feel upset when our room is noisy in the evenings."

You might even preface it by say ing, "I have something to tell you and I'm afraid I might hurt your feelings."

Speaking for yourself establishes perience and declares that your ob-servations, thoughts and feeling have value.

-Say What You Observe. Describe in a factual way what you see, hear, smell, taste or touch.

with an interpretative statement.
Use caution here. Just beginning with an "I" doesn't qualify your statement as an "I" message.
Don't say, "I think you are inconsiderate." Try instead, "It seems possible to me that you don't know I'm studying." Although interpretative statements do evaluate people and events, that doesn't negate them as expressions of your experience. By speaking for yourself, you make it obvious that you don't insist on others agreeing with your point of

A flaw in the president search

Thank you for giving us the complete text of Carolyn Bratt's statement to the UK Board of Trustees. She argued well as to why she thought UK's presidential search process was flawed and should have been extended.

But she overlooked a key element in just how the process was flawed.

The faculty of this university are equally responsible for the flawed process. For one thing, it failed early on to discern that although the Board of Trustees could conduct an open search, that search could still be flawed.

be flawed.

The board can build a plausible case as to their conducting an open search by identifying a number of criterial attributes as to what will count as an open search.

But as pointed out by UK political science professor Malcolm Lewell in the Lexington Herald-Leader, the search was flawed because candi-dates were informed by the board search was tlawed because candidates were informed by the board that a majority were committed to the interim president.

Here we can see that one can conduct an open search and it still can be deeply flawed. This was not emphasized enough by the faculty.

The main reason, though, that the faculty is primarily responsible for the flawed search has to do with the character of the faculty. This faculty simply went through the ritual of noting inadequacies in the search process and taking such ritualistic actions as passing a resolution for extending the search.

Bratt made a relevant, brief point in that regard when she noted that "many of my colleagues are here to day to be ar silent witness to the actions of this board."

Writing resolutions is a form of "death squads" against dissenters and insurgent groups. Surely this faculty was capable of more than silent witnessing and ritualistic actions. Capable, yes; likely to be so, no. This is the same faculty that is programmed to seek individualistic success in the academic game. This is the same faculty that because of its individualistic ethose will not come to the defense of a faculty member whose research interests do not fit conventional perceptions of bona fide inquiry. This is the same faculty that will sit dily by when people are driven from the University. This is the same faculty that administrators know they can select from for committees that will decide the way the administrators want them to. So don't put the blame on the UK "death squads" against dissenters tions of this board."

Writing resolutions is a form of silent witness, too. Silent witness from an invisible faculty.

Oppressed peasants in Third World countries have to bear silent witness to the overwhelming power of landlords who are ready to use

Dog breath

"The Doggy Bag," by Kenn Minter, published on Sept. 11 was not only offensive but also sent out the opinion that when a woman says "no" she really means "yes." The caption was under the title "Fibs Those Phillies Are Full Of."

I wonder if men or Minter truly believe that "no" means "yes." If not, why would he advocate men to rape a date with the mentality that "she wants it!"
Being a journalism major and having worked for a community mewspaper myself, I know of newspaper's rights of freedom of speech and free expression. In fact, I am in support of them. But there is a fine line between "free speech" and printing and supporting the statement that "rape is OK."

Yet, I am not concerned that this carroon offended me; that is irrelevant.

graduate student men who read that cartoon.

You're right — a man probably will not rape his next date because of Minter's cartoon. Yet, for Minter to advocate and reinforce that stand is sickening.
And, yes, after the reinforcement from the Kentucky Kernel, friends, fraternity brothers and even family, a man could come to believe that when a woman says "no" she means "yes".

"yes." For Minter to take such a stand is not only in reckless bad taste, but also feeds the male mentality that such actions are OK, and if they want sex, they can "take" it. That is want sex, they can "take" it. That is totally untrue. I am not a feminist or a soap-box preacher. I am not writing this as a woman or a journalist — I am writing this as a friend of a rape victim. I am also sure that every person on campus knows a rape victim; I have experienced that intense fear myself. It is not a good feeling, and it is not 0K for men to act that way. Knowing the fear and seeing the results of a friend who was raped, I do not see or understand how Minter not see or understand how Minter could be so totally insensitive to-could be so totally insensitive to-ward women.

Men do not have the right to rape and justify it by saying, "She want-ed it." For Minter and the Kentucky Kernel to advocate such actions surns my stomach.

Yet I will not boycott the Ken-tucky Kernel or dispute your right to print whatever you print. That is your right. But I do not believe that right should be abused for the pur-pose of getting a laugh.

Minter may believe that being controversial is a key to being suc-cessful, but the key to being a successful, but the key to being a twomen or spread the lie that "rape is OK."

Being a successful journalist in-

OK."

Being a successful journalist involves the courage to tell the truth and to stand up for what is right. It also involves admitting it when you make a mistake.

"To overturn the policy at this point, after making such a progressive move last year, shows a total lack of foresight, a total lack of consideration, especially in the way that it was done," said Mike Johnson, last year's IFC president.
Johnson called the amendment a "complete and total railroad" because it excluded the opinions of "You have a small number of chapters, not even a majority of chapters in the system, deciding policy for the entire system," Johnson sid. "It's probably the most disgusting thing I've seen fraternities do at this University."

Fraternity adviser Ron Lee said revision of the policy would be largely symbolic, because less than five fraternities are allowed by their national charter to purchase alcohol. "I'm a little surprised at the outcome, but with only 10 chapters voting, it made it a close call either way," said Lee, also an assistant dean of students." I was hoping to stay with the current policy."

While she enjoys the challenge of helping people in investigations, Carpenter said her job can be frustrating when people refuse to take responsibility for crime prevention.

"The police can't do it all if people aren't going to get involved and if they don't care what happens," she said. "If somebody doesn't put a stop to it somewhere and stand up for themselves and other people then that's how crime runs rampant."

The woman traps herself between a wall of shrubs and Kirwan II residence hall and begins pacing between the building's columns.
Slightly out of breath, the officer reaches the woman and tries to calm her, but she will not face him.
Staring at the ground, she continuses to pace and avoids the officer's eyes. Finally, she walks to an open area and is joined by a friend.
The woman's friend explains that the woman always acts this way towards policemen, that her behavior

Schroering stays until the woman and her friend walk away. Unable to do anything else, he leaves.

Once in the patrol car, he is approached by another man. This time, the man asks if Schroering was just investigating a possible rape. The officer interviews the man. Schroering has suspicions about what occurred. Suspicions and what occurred. Unfortunately, at the moment he cannot pursue those suspicions.

This isn't unusual. Students, Schroering says, often fail to report crimes because they think the UK police can't help them. This is a problem with all types of crimes, not just the violent ones.
"A lot of people have their cars broken into and figure they can't get anything back," he says, noting that recently some stolen car stereos were found. "The people who made reports got their stereos back."

At about 1:30 a.m. Schroering hears on the police radio an officer ask for someone to deliver a brea-halyzer to confirm a possible drunken driver.

Another officer stands on the sidewalk explaining to a middle-aged Hispanic man why he was pulled over.

The man blows on the breathayer's plastic mouthpiece. At thry red light begins flashing as a high-pitched beep sounds from the device.

After failing the test three times, the officer asks the man to face the opposite direction and step against the police cruiser. It will be his third arrest for driving under the influence.

The officer then pats the man down, searching for any weapons.

Schroering searches the man's car and discovers a concealed deadly weapon. It is a set of brass knuckles with a built-in switchblade knife.

"It was concealed even though he wasn't actually carrying it."
