Homegrown reporters: This year's inductees to the Kentucky Journalism Hall of Fame reflect a diverse group of protectors of freedom, liberty

By Jill Gorin

Six UK alumni journalists joined an elite group of people yesterday as they were inducted into the Kentucky Journalism Hall of Fame. Surviving members of the group attended a luncheon and dinner at the faculty club where they expressed their sincere gratitude to the school and remembered their time here at UK.

"Working at the Kernel were the best years," said Jim Hampton, Hall of Fame inductee. "It's great to be back. It's my heart and soul."

Hampton was editor in-chief of the Kentucky Kernel in 1599, the first year the Kernel became a daily newspaper. The inductees had traveled from Los Angeles to Miami, doing what they love.

Senate OKs advising overhauls

By Mark Boxley

In what should prove to be very beneficial to students, two SGA-sponsored proposals concerning academic advising and student representation were accepted into UK policy by the UK senate yesterdaposal dealt with the creation of an Academic Advising Standing Committee that will, for the quality of academic advising and set standards, review and examine faculty and professional advising.

For the Senate Council, it will make recommendations regarding academic advising and will consider all other recommendations made to the University Senate involving academic advising.

The proposal would unpair cross-disciplinary courses and allow the departments within the university to pair them more accordingly to fit a student's individual major.

The premise is that with the current setup, certain classes are paired with only certain other classes.

The proposition would make it possible to pair a class within a persons major to another class within the major and have it satisfy the cross-disciplinary requirement.

Law will allow British pubs open 24 hours

Hoping to cut down on rowdy scenes as thousands of Britons pour out of pubs simultaneously at the mandatory 11 p.m. closing time, the government on Tuesday proposed allowing pubs to stay open 24 hours a day.

Scrapping closing time was the centerpiece of plans to liberalize and streamline licensing laws that were inspired by fears of munitions workers getting drunk during World War I.

"Fixed closing times encourage binge drinking around last orders," Home Secretary Jack Straw told the House of Commons. "The result is lots of people hitting the streets—and sometimes each other—at the same time."

Under the government proposals, released as a discussion paper, any pub, licensed cafe or restaurant can apply to stay open for 24 hours, seven days a week.

While some U.S. cities and towns are moving toward earlier bar closings to combat heavy drinking, in Britain, the bureau-crats, police and barredners all believe that longer hours will recombine the children will also be allowed into pubs for the first time. Eighteen is the minimum legal age for buying liquor in a pub.

"This is a step in the right direction toward the repeal of archaic laws set during wartime," said Mary Curnock, director of the British Institute of Innkeeping which represents 16,500 licenseses.

Misinformed writer needs to learn

While reading Kristie Melton's "editorial." I had to wonder if she actually cared about the facts of sweatshop labor, or if she were simply bored with repeated news coverage. Melton asks, "Why not have information forums where students can learn about these atrocities and invoke involvement through compassion?" They did. Where were you, Miss Melton, when two actuals weatshop employees were brought to UK's campus to talk to you when they lost their jobs because they droug. "When we would not they cannot be they cannot be under the company? They had children at home to feed, yet they came to the United States in a desperate plea to end their slavery. Where were you? Sometimes you need to have the nerve to go find unpleasant information, but yet you admit never having gone to an LSU rally because you don't like, "...being badgered by my classmates because they feel more enlightened than I." Since you're so enlightened than I." Since you're so enlightened than I." Since you're so enlightened than I." seen-ove'll' approach to their issue. Oh, right, You never bothered to meet them.

Sweat shop anger in wrong direction

As the old saying goes, you can't fight city hall. That certainly is the lesson that 12 students learned just this week when they decided to protest the university administration in hopes of forcing them to join a new organization who monitors sweat-shop labor. My problem is this: That the issue of sweatshop labor is not a problem for the university and President Wethington to tackle. What would these children have us do, research every article of clothing that we purchase to make sure that it is not made by unfair sweatshop labor practices? I am a realist in the truest sense in that I know that exploitation is part of making an almighty dollar. If these children want to make a difference, they should get a one way ticket to somewhere like China, fight their dictatorial politics of human suffering for profit and see if the government of China listens. The sooner you children realize that big money and corporations rule the world, the better off you will be. If you do go to China, stay there and protest and stop blocking the working place of the honorable President Wethington and other employees' offices. We don't care about this issue!

To the Editor:

It is heartening to see President Wethington's concern about the responsibility regarding human welfare at home and abroad. We should applaud the President's sensitivity to sweat-shop protesters and his acute awareness of the amount of influence available to him in the capacities of the profession he holds within his realm, that is, the University of Kentucky. He holds within his realm, that is, the University of Kentucky. He same time, by expressing ultimate concern for their physical health. Like President Wethington, the police also perceived the inhumane conditions under which the students had thus placed themselves. Accordingly, they prevented anyone from bringing food into the building in order to encourage the students to excreise their human rights, unchain themselves and leave the building as free men and women. The consequent arrest of the students was to their benefit as well—it helped strengthen the foundation for dialogue between the students and UK officials. Finally, if there had been no arrest, the students would never have realized that, no matter how much tuttion money they paid to UK, the campus buildings would never truly belong to them. They would always be trespassers.

Some applaud Wethington's actions

Music hits abuse issues, not justified violence

Violence in music is making mess and stirring up controversy yet again, although this time the surface of the criticism. Country with the stereotypical moid for the criticism. Country music superstars the Dixie Chicks are the focus of these rectner complaints, due to their latest single, "Goodbye Earl." The song tells the story of a woman and her best friend murface the two use to eliminate this cretin? Poisoned black-eyed peas, of course. After all, unlike some country artists, these Chicks feel a certain loyalty to their genre.

But while country radio stations might enjoy the down-home delicacy, many have problems with the message and content of the song. In fact, some stations are refusing to play the new single altogether.

According to disc jockey, Travis Moon, quoted in Monday's USA Thoday, a lot of great it is OK to kill."

Obviously, these people are missing the point. The song is not about murder being good. The song is about the abuse of women being downright intolerable.

In society we have come to virtually accept gangster rap songs advocating violent acts ranging from revenge-spurned murder to forced sexual acts. For the most part, they now go relatively unnoticed in our society. Hell, we're used to it.

But when three ladies from Texas attempt to tell women not to stand for abusive behavior, we ban the song from being heard. People actually question America's priority and value systems? Imagine that considering these circumstances.

ority and value systems? Imagine that considering these circumstances.

Maybe we just don't expect such a message from the "wholesome" country music genre and assume that an even more questionable message is acceptable if it comes from artists from inner cities.

Either way one argues, a clear double standard exists. Carth Brooks experienced the same criticism when his video for "The Thunder Rolls," depicted a woman shooting her cheating, abusive husband.

More than a few eyebrows were raised by Martina McBri'de's song, "Independence Day," that brought up the subject of overcoming the struggles of abuse. Finally, and light-hearted stab at reconciling relationships, yet it was banned on several stations.

All of these songs faced their fair share of critics. It is also interesting to note that each of the songs went on to be hits for the singers as well.

Some may argue that the success is the result of the controversy. I argue that the success comes from the fact that the listeners understand the true messages of these singles more than the radio station executives give them credit for.

singles more than the radio station executives give them credit for.

"Goodbye Earl" does have a clear message. The message is that if you are a guy and you don't beat up on women, then you shouldn't have to worry about your wife spiking your black-eyed peas with arsenic.

Personally, that message sounds reasonable and more than fair to me. In fact, the only people who should be afraid of "Earl's" message are those individuals who abuse their "loved ones."

People are upset because the song simply states that "Earl had to die." It is too bad that people are as equally upset that "Wanda started gettin' abused."

Considering the attitude "Earl" is portrayed to have in the song, he should consider himself lucky that he got a nice warm meal to send him off.

For those who disagree with the message of the song and subsequently agree with the radio boycott, it's too bad that you didn't eat from the same batch of black-eyed peas.
